TENDER

Attorney General Daugherty indicates a tender regard for the feelings of profiteers. He assures them, according to the public press, that he will not prosecute them "until it is established absolutely on the face of the record that the case against them will stand the acid test."

This means that the profiteers need not fear prosecution unless they have bungled their affairs so badly that the department of justice (which the attorney general calls the government) will be compelled to act.

The profiteer is guilty of the most contemptible offense that can be committed against a people involved in war. He even lacks the nerve often shown by the profiteer who betrays the most heinous offense against a nation.

The profiteers, however, need not any fear from the department of justice, if they present any sort of a bluff defense, and if they employ attorneys who are versed in legal devices and delays that sharp practice knows so well.

The profiteers are told by the man who is sworn to uphold the law and administer justice that he will not prosecute where the case can "stand the acid test"—where the offense is so glaring that it is, in essence and delay is useless.

Mr. Daugherty's attitude toward the profiteers is in sharp contrast to his attitude toward railroad men. With the profiteers the attorney general talks like counsel for the defense. He says his department (which he is calling the government) "must be fair to itself and even to those whom it would brand as crooks and profiteers."

The profiteer took advantage of the nation when it was in its hour of need.

The attorney general is fearful lest some profiteer will be so thoroughly punished, but he aided the profiteer in the anti-miner press.
